UN.—[This Saxon prefix is equivalent in meaning to the privative a of the Greeks and the privative in of the Latins ; and it is placed, almost at will, before adjectives and adverbs, and before perfect participles of active verbs to form adjectives, and also before many present participles, a considerable number of nouns, and a small number of verbs. When prefixed to adjectives, participles, and adverbs, it is uniformly interpreted by not ; in substantives, by the want or absence of ; and in verbs it commonly signifies the reversing or annulling of the action or state expressed by the simple verb. The verbs to unarm, unclose, uncover, undo, unload, and some others, express a positive act of privation. There are some very common adjectives which do not take this negative prefix ; as, good, bad, little, small, great, large, near, distant, right, wrong, &c. The adjectives unequal, unabridged, unseen, unsold, &c., are purely negative, and imply merely the absence or negation of that which is denoted by the more simple terms equal, abridged, &c. But the adjectives unhappy, unbecoming, unsafe, and some others, have a positive as well as a negative signification, implying not only the want of what is expressed by the simple words happy, becoming, &c., but also the presence of the contrary quality. There are a few cases in which the negative prefixes in and un are used indifferently ; as, infrequent or unfrequent, inexpert or unexpert, inexperienced or unexperienced, ineligible or uneligible, &c. The prefix un is more commonly used before adjectives derived from the Anglo-Saxon, and in before such as are derived from the Latin. WORCESTER.]
